The whey market saw more activity this week compared to the past few. The price range for whey did not change in the East this week. Reported sales fell within the established range. International demand for whey saw a small increase with some Asian countries increasing demand. Domestic demand is holding steady. CME prices for dry whey, week to date, dropped slightly, closing at $0.5375 on Wednesday. Manufacturers are still producing enough dry whey to keep inventories steady, but some contacts mention a desire to transition to higher protein concentrations of whey to compete in that growing market.
